The show will chronicle the women as they “run in the same social circles, thriving in one of the most diverse and electric cities in the world. From fashion and real estate, to philanthropy and social influence, these women have made their mark in NYC and will now share their lives as they juggle careers, family life and jam-packed social calendars in the city that never sleeps,” according to a press release from Bravo.

Following the show's finale, a source told PEOPLE last October that Bravo launched an internal investigation after complaints of racism were filed among the cast. "Cast and members of the production were interviewed, but the investigation was closed after nothing substantial was found," said the source.

The source said the investigation was one of the reasons the season 13 reunion was pushed back and later canceled. A Bravo spokesperson previously said that a reunion did not take place due to "scheduling challenges" and that the network would be "shifting our focus to next season."

In his interview with Variety, Cohen said that the creative team would be casting its net “all over Manhattan and the boroughs” for its 14th season.

He added, “We are quite literally looking for who will be the new Real Housewives of New York City! And I think this represents a tremendous opportunity for a rebirth of the show. What we’re looking for is everything that makes a great Housewife: fun, opinionated, successful, aspirational women who represent a side of New York that we want to see more of.”

Along with the decision to shake up the Real Housewives of New York City cast, Cohen said that Bravo would introduce RHONY: Legacy, a new series in the Housewives franchise featuring some of the most beloved New York Housewives.
